

Our Values

How we make decisions, hire, promote, and disagree.

Customer Obsession

We start with the customer's reality, not our preferred technical solution. When customer feedback contradicts our internal priorities, the customer signal wins until we have a documented reason to override it.

- We listen for what customers say and what they stop saying.
- We ship what customers need, not what is easiest for us to operate.
- When a customer's product behavior changes, we treat that as a signal, not a complaint.

Ownership

We pick up the work that needs doing. We are accountable for outcomes, not for our slice of the org chart.

- We do not wait for the obvious owner to step in.
- We document what we own. If it is not written down, it is not owned.
- We say no clearly when we own something that is not our priority — and explain why.

Technical Truth

We argue with facts, not vibes. We change our minds publicly when we are wrong. We never overstate our contributions or hide our gaps.

- We distinguish between what we built, what our team built, and what someone else built.
- When we are wrong, we write the post-mortem on our own decision.
- We push back on senior leaders in writing, not in hallway gossip.

Deliberate Decisions

Important decisions get a written doc. Decisions do not survive Slack threads. We commit on a clock.

- Every non-trivial call is written down and circulated for 48 hours before it locks in.
- We name the criteria that would change our minds, before the data comes in.
- We revisit decisions when reality contradicts the assumptions they were built on.

Growth Orientation

We hire for trajectory and we promote for evidence. We invest in feedback because we believe people change.

- We give specific feedback in writing.
- We acknowledge our own gaps before our managers have to.
- We treat performance reviews as a synthesis of an ongoing conversation, not a once-a-year revelation.

These values are how we hire and how we promote. They are how we hold each other accountable.
